

Globalization and Productivity

The Globalization of the World Economy series

Edited by David Greenaway, Professor of Economics, Pro-Vice Chancellor and Director, Leverhulme Centre for Research on Globalisation and Economic Policy, University of Nottingham, UK, Holger Görg, Professor of International Economics, Christian-Albrechts-University Kiel and the Kiel Institute for the World Economy, Kiel, Germany and Richard Kneller, Associate Professor of Economics, Leverhulme Centre for Research on Globalisation and Economic Policy, University of Nottingham, UK

This two-volume set is an indispensable selection of recent and classic research papers exploring the link between globalization and productivity growth. The editors' careful selection includes articles that focus on the impact of globalization on aggregate productivity, openness, international technology diffusion, and trade adjustment and productivity growth. Other topics include inward and outward foreign direct investment, international outsourcing and the critical relationship between exporting and productivity. The set will be an essential reference point for researchers, students and policy-makers concerned with globalization and productivity.
