Rural–urban migration is an important aspect in the development of countries. Until the late 1980s China was one of the few countries that controlled population movement both directly and indirectly through policies of economic and social control. The gradual relaxation of these policies has resulted in greater freedom of movement for the population, the effects of which are discussed in this significant volume.

‘The book is certainly worth reading for those interested in the political and social aspects of internal movement in China today. It focuses on a topic that deserves a great deal more attention in the debates about the social and political consequences of rural–urban mobility in China – both for the urban regions, but also for the regions which migrants leave behind.’
– Mette Halskov Hansen, China Information

‘Contemporary Minority Migration, Education and Ethnicity in China breaks important new ground in studying the interrelationships of migration, ethnicity and education.’
– Hein Mallee, The China Journal

‘This is an excellent book that will go a long way in introducing readers to many important and relevant demographic issues of the minorities of China.’

‘Offering an in-depth analysis of this internal migration, the book proves indispensable for gaining a better understanding of the changes inherent in China’s transition from a planned to a market economy.’
– Isabelle Attané, China Perspectives

‘Migration scholars will welcome this data-rich treatment of what is currently the most important movement of people world-wide – namely the eight million or more people moving from rural to urban areas in China each year. This is a milestone book, showing extensive and fruitful collaboration between Australian and Chinese scholars. The fieldwork is accomplished and professional, while the results reported are genuinely original and stimulating.’
– Robin Cohen, University of Warwick, UK