The Legacy of Thorstein Veblen

Intellectual Legacies in Modern Economics series

Edited by Rick Tilman, Professor Emeritus of Public Administration, University of Nevada, Las Vegas, US

Veblen was an original thinker, responsible for introducing and popularising a host of important concepts and insights. He ignited controversy not only in economics, but also in sociology, history and political science. The number and quality of the responses to his work provide evidence of the novelty and explanatory power of his ideas. These comprehensive volumes will enable the reader to sample the broad spectrum of Veblen’s thought and that of his critics and interpreters. They include critical appraisals of the corpus of his published work as well as reinterpretations of his life and influence on the social sciences particularly economics, political science and sociology.

‘The thoughtful anthology on studies of Veblen is most timely in an era when profits no longer have much to do with productivity and conspicuous consumption is more conspicuous than ever. America’s greatest social scientist dealt with emotions that continue to plague us – competitive rivalry, desire, envy, emulation.’
