Women, Gender and Rural Development in China

Edited by Tamara Jacka and Sally Sargeson, Australian National University

This multidisciplinary book explores gender politics in the discourses and practices of development in rural China. The contributors – scholars in political science, anthropology, gender, development and Chinese studies – examine how differently positioned women are shaping rural development, and how development is affecting women’s capabilities and gender power relations.

‘...well-written and lively...this is an exciting collection, which offers both useful factual information on past and current developments in rural China and sophisticated conceptual insights...The book will be valuable for researchers interested in either gender or rural development in China. It will also be a welcome addition to course reading lists on contemporary China, not least because of the fine introduction by the editors.’
– Rachel A. Murphy, China Journal

‘Women, Gender and Rural Development in China is a superbly rich volume of thickly textured, reflective, and critical accounts of gendered processes of rural development. There is no doubt that it will make a significant contribution to the field of gender and rural development. This engaging edited volume will be essential reading for students and researchers of gender, development, and China.’
